ABOUT THE CONFERENCE

In recent years, the importance of Environmental Humanities has gained forefront as the impact of anthropogenic processes on the planet require a more multidisciplinary approach to mitigate and find solutions to the rapidly deteriorating ecosystems, resources, and climate change at a global scale. The advent of the Industrial Revolution heralds the beginning of the Anthropocene Era as human activities significantly altered Earth's ecosystems and geology. This has necessitated inquiries into the relationship between humans and the world they inhabit as anthropogenic activities threaten to not only alter but also deplete, pollute and exploit resources. The socio-cultural, political, economic and historical nexus of human activities have to be studied in the context of the shared relationships with "other than humans" entities, a new approach that would require us to move away from the singular focus on human lives and adopt a more inclusive, holistic methodology while considering long-term goals towards ecojustice and sustainability. Environmental Humanities, therefore, aspires to bring within its ambit, aspects of existing conversations and debates on environmental philosophy, environmental history, Ecocriticism, cultural geography and anthropology, and political ecology as shaped by various disciplinary contexts.

The Anthropocene Era, true to its name, has been defined by the large-scale impact on the planet's climate and ecosystem as a result of human interference. The global village of excessive consumerism and its entanglements with the larger socio-political web and vested interests of nation states over control of resources and power complicate the assessment and mitigation of the environmental crisis that looms at large.

The focus of the conference, therefore, will include but not limited to exploring multidisciplinary methodologies and approaches toward understanding ecojustice and sustainability in terms of human interferences, both positive and negative.
